Transfer these files safely from one computer to another via network. The first modern structural analysis of mouse meiotic chromosomes: identification of autosomal centromeres. In somatic mammalian cells, centromeres are composed of repetitive α -satellite DNA sequences and pericentromeric heterochromatin. Meiotic cells of Drosophila melanogaster and many other organisms have been found to have a unique non-repetitive chromatin component at their centromeres, termed the central element (CE). Therefore, the non-repetitive chromatin structure of mouse meiotic centromeres was examined. Chromosomes were isolated from male meiotic cells using a standard Pronase digestion procedure, and the non-repetitive chromatin was fractionated and analyzed using molecular cytogenetic techniques. We found that mouse centromeres consist of a unique non-repetitive chromatin structure, which we call the centric element (CE). The CE is essential for central spindle and kinetochore assembly and for the cell cycle functions of the kinetochore. As non-repetitive centromeres are common in evolutionary conserved eukaryotes, these
