to alleviate this problem, you can use the simple `document.write()` instruction to load the content into the page. this will work if the content is loaded at the same time as the rest of the page, but can cause some issues if it is loaded asynchronously. similar to using the script tag above, we can use `document.write()` to start loading content. we use the script tag for the content to load and then we prevent the `document.write()` to behave like a browser would normally. we can also use this technique to load asynchronous content, such as iframes or javascript. when an iframe is loaded, it needs to know the url of the parent frame. this is a fairly common requirement, so we will load the iframe's url in the current frame. anyway, if you do not want to use the com-server, you can disable it with the "com services manager", which is part of windows nt professional. windbg also contains a command to disable a service called: . of modern internet. the complexity of the algorithms, the speed of the parsing of both html and css, the network congestion and the increased loading time and the stress put on server hardware all make it important to use compression to increase performance and reduce server load. an important question is how to run a binary file directly without having the virus and virus definition file. a binary virus is an executable file with embedded malicious code. some viruses are binary and do not require any explicit executable file, but to complete the installation, they must be copy to a specific folder on the hard drive. once the file is executed, it then proceeds to infect the computer in a stealthy manner. other viruses (also referred to as immature viruses) need some help from other malware in order to infect the computer. they are called crypters.

which tells us that the external content was loaded, and then we play the `#document.currentscript.parentNode.removeChild` in the context of the loading xhr event. dynamic content elements may be difficult to load on certain internet browsers. javascript will not load dynamic content if it is not loaded when the document is ready. this approach will work but is not perfect. some time later the browser will go back into a ready state and the script will fire again, only this time the code will not work since it has no reference to the page. this is especially an issue if the data is controlled by a third party such as a social networking site. in these cases the script should be delayed for some time to give the browser time to load the content. 5ec8ef588b
