The Main Objective of this training is to review the contents of the RPL (Reciprocating engine) ATPL aircraft performance syllabus (RVSM F4A) and prepare students to earn the ATPL RVSM CFI rating. This book has been designed for the RPL (Reciprocating engine) Avionics Technician only. Whenever you would like to enjoy a flight, you want to be confident that your aircraft, its systems, and you, are safe, ready to fly and capable of continuing your trip with your pilot safely and securely. There are many reasons why this happens. For example, you may have a mechanical failure or a communications failure, or something entirely unexpected could occur. The general design of the ATPL concept is an instrument-rated B Licence with IFR qualifications in either of two different aircraft, such as the ARJ 21 and the PD-350A. The B Licence Qualification can be achieved in any of the following way: Instrument Rating, Meteorological Certified Pilots Licence, Single Pilot Licence, Multi Pilot Licence, Commercial Pilot Licence, Airline Transport Pilot Licence, Airline Transport Pilot with Instrument Rating, Airline Transport Pilot with Meteorological Certification. Instrument Rated Pilots Licence is the technical qualification required for pilots who are flying and monitoring flight instruments in an IFR environment. The ATPL is a route from a B Licence to an Instrument Rating, but if you want to use an IFR-compliant aircraft to train for the ATPL, you will need your instructor's consent and approval. The ATPL also involves the purchase of a suitable flight manual and a standard instrument rating to be obtained prior to training. Training is usually conducted in a standard instrument weather environment, usually the training operator's meteorological office. A typical scenario is given below. However, pilots should never assume they will learn all they need from such training. For example, as mentioned, the ATPL is a route to the instrument rating, but simply by taking the ATPL, you will not necessarily be granted an instrument rating. 5ec8ef588b
